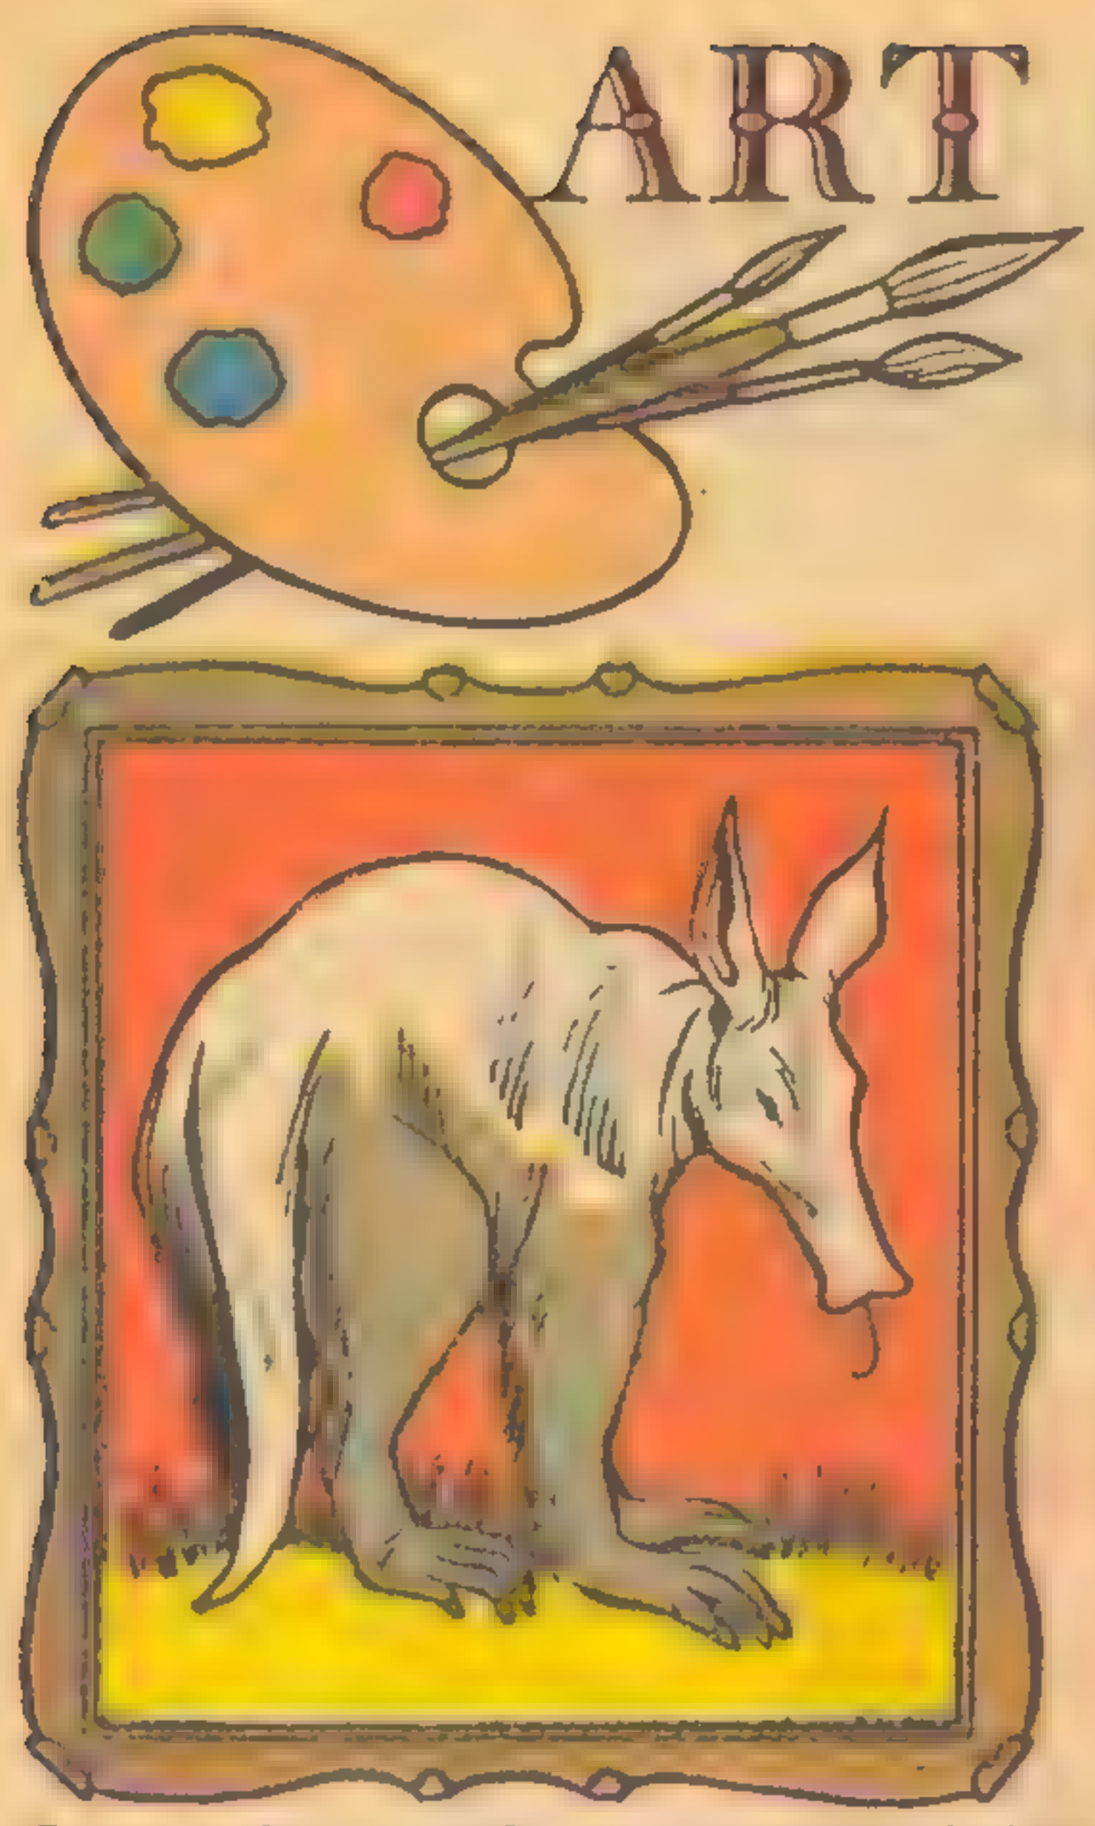
ART GALLERY



Some animals look as strange as their names sound. The AARDVARK is an anteater with a long snout and large claws for digging.

The PLATYPUS is about two feet long, and has a bill and duck feet. It lives on river banks, spending most of its life in water. It eats worms and insects.

The GNU is the ugly member of the antelope family. Gnus roam the African plains in vast herds. They look dangerous, but fear man.

The ARMADILLO has an armored shell and can curl up into a ball when attacked. The shell can also be used to crush small snakes.

KEYS OF KNOWLEDGE

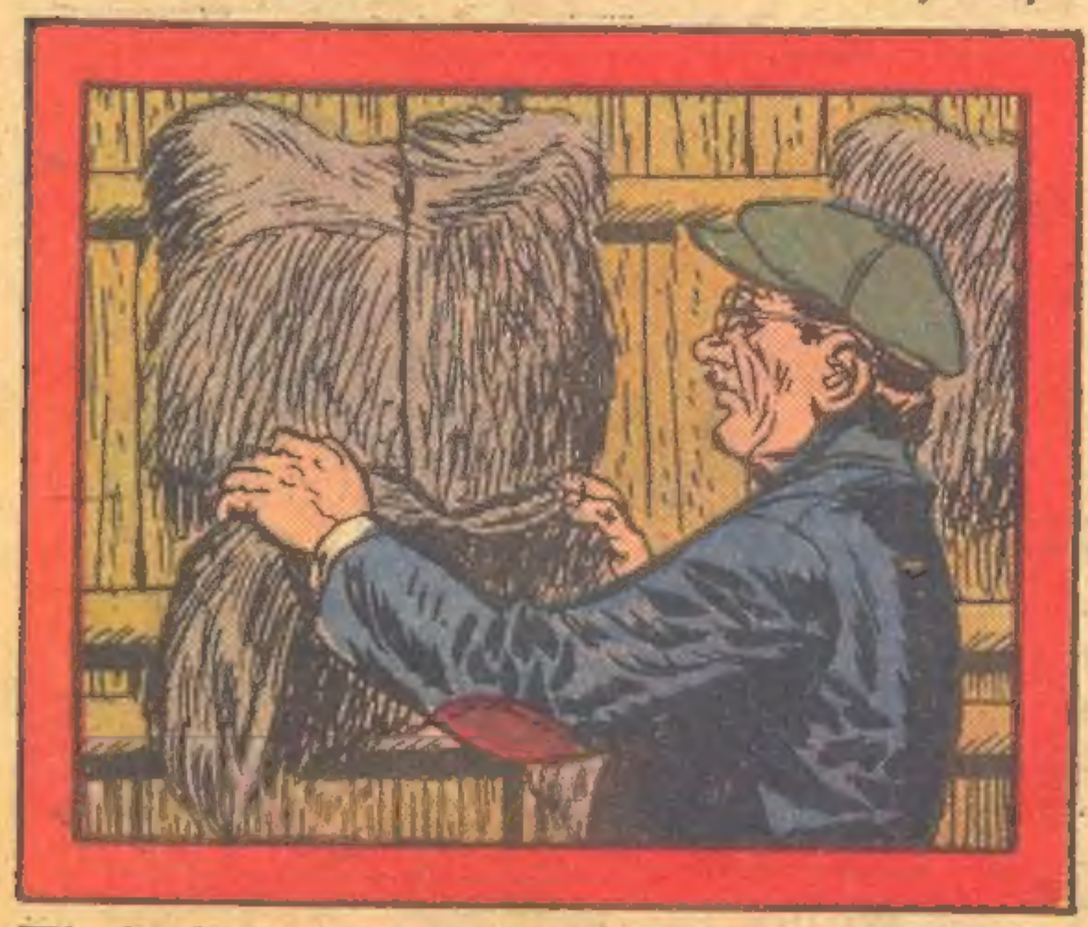
The OPOSSUM

© 1964. WESTERN PUBLISHING COMPANY.

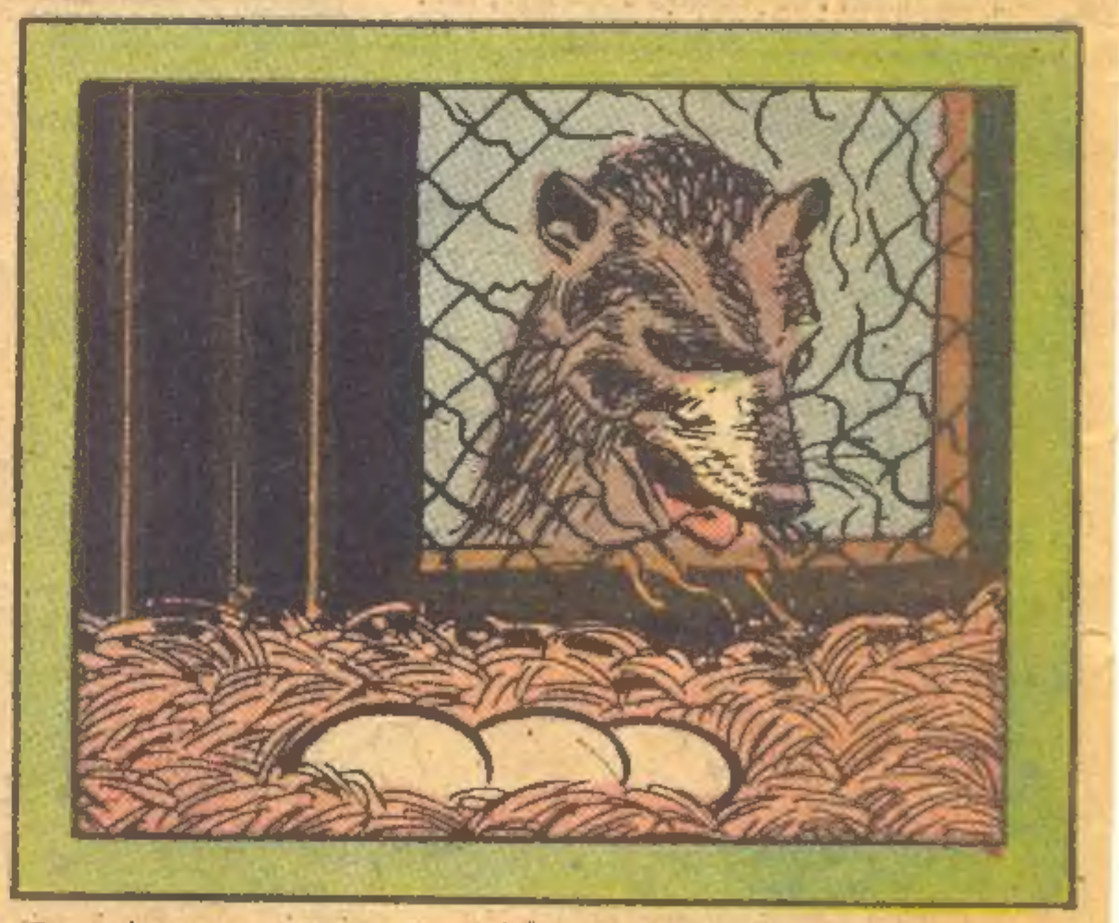
Opossums, known as "pouched animals" belong to a primitive specie found in parts of the United States and sections of Mexico.

When 20 are born, only the first 11 who make their way to the mother's pouch, will live. They remain there for seventy days.

Opossums are trapped, shot, and caught by hand. If frightened, they "feign" death. This has been known as "playing possum".



Their flesh, although greasy, is considered "tasty". Opossum's fur, only 6% the durability of otter, is in very good demand.



Opossums like farm country, but are not popular with farmers. Given opportunity, they kill poultry and destroy vegetables.
